LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE IN WISCONSIN

By MRS. MARY MORAN KIRSCH, Librarian, Wisconsin Legislative Reference Library

UNDER a democratic form of government a law must be the expression of the will of the people and it is, therefore, essential that proper facilities be provided so that this will may be ascertained. One way of attaining this object is secured by adequate study and discussion in the legislature, conducted with sufficient freedom to permit every useful contribution of ideas and opinions, and with sufficient deliberation to exclude as far as possible the untoward influence of haste and passion. The process through which legislation, introduced into the Wisconsin legislature, is to pass must, therefore, be based on a system with ample opportunity for consideration, as well as a reconsideration, of the decisions taken. For these reasons our lawmakers must themselves be governed by laws and rules, collectively known as legislative procedure, the purpose of which is, generally speaking, to attend to public business with the maximum of speed combined with a maximum of care. Due order must be followed in the transaction of business so as to avoid the confusion which is liable to result when a body of one hundred thirty-three men, representing varied groups of people, tries to reach a definite conclusion.

MRS. KIRSCH

There are three things that the legislators may do at each session or meeting of the legislature,—repeal old laws in the statutes, amend old laws, or create new laws. The intent in regard to any one of these three prerogatives must be presented to the legislature in a bill prepared according to definite rules. A bill must be so drawn as to state definitely its purpose. It must not contain more than one subject and it must be properly worded, in language consistent with the Wisconsin statutes, and numbered so as to fit into the statutes. But a bill is much more than a mere sheet of paper expressing the desire of someone to change or modify the existing law. When it becomes a law it is liable to affect seriously social and economic relations. It may do a great deal of good, but it also is liable to work injustice or injury. For these reasons, it is pertinent to inquire into the various factors which are involved in the application of a law to actual life, into the possible effects of its administration, and into the experience of other states and countries with similar laws. The preparation of most of the bills introduced into the legislature is, therefore, based on a certain amount of research bearing on these points. This research, as well as the mechanical preparation of the bills, is provided at state expense by the Wisconsin legislative reference library, which employs trained librarians and research workers and experts in bill drafting. These services, with limitations as to bill drafting, are available not only to legislators, but to all who wish to ask for them.

A bill, properly worded and drawn, may be introduced either by a member of the legislature or by a legislative committee. As a matter of fact, anyone who desires to have a bill introduced is able to get a member to introduce it for him. If a measure introduced into the legislature does not have behind it a definite interest on the part of a member or some other support, its possibility of passage is slight. Some bills, for which members are unwilling to take direct responsibility, may be introduced "by request". Bills may be introduced either in the senate or in the assembly. Immediately upon introduction, an assembly bill is referred to the revision committee, and a senate bill to the revision clerk. The purpose of this action is to eliminate technical errors and make the bill fit in with existing legislation. Records of section numbers affected are carefully kept so as to prevent confusion and duplication. When reported in correct form by the assembly revision committee or the senate revision clerk, bills are read—usually by title only—before either house and referred to the proper committees for consideration, e.g.,—all appropriation bills and all bills providing for revenue or relating to taxation are referred to the joint committee on finance, bills on agriculture are referred to the committee on agriculture and so on.

At this point, a few words should be said about the nature and functions of legislative committees. Assembly committees are appointed by the speaker; senate committees by a committee on committees. Their function is to study the bills in detail and to recommend action to the assembly or the senate, as the case may be. The committees of one house act independently of those of the other house. The most important characteristic of the committee system is that it constitutes a link between the legislature and the public. This relation finds expression in committee hearings, which are held on every bill for the purpose of finding out the sentiment of the various interests concerning the enactment of a given measure. Committee hearings are public and devoid of any kind of secrecy. Anyone who has something to say in regard to a bill—or thinks that he has something to say—can come and freely express his opinion either for or against a bill. Every committee is required to keep a record of its hearings. An important rule of the Wisconsin legislature is that all bills referred to a committee in either house must be reported out of committee. This not only insures full publicity, but also prevents the exercise of predatory influences which might succeed in killing a bill in the committee without allowing it to come before the legislature as a whole. Public committee hearings are of great value because they enable the legislature to obtain full information as to various phases of the problem involved in a bill and to find out the attitude of the public in regard to it. In order, however, to prevent abuses, the right to speak at a committee hearing is regulated so far as lobbyists, representing various interests, are concerned, such persons being required to register with the secretary of state, indicating the interests which they represent and the type of legislation in which they are interested. In order that all parties interested in legislation may be heard, hearings of committees are scheduled in advance and listed on a special calendar.

At the close of a hearing, the committee goes into executive session and votes upon the bill. It is then returned to the proper legislative house, carrying the committee's recommendation either that it pass or that it be indefinitely postponed. The date for its consideration is then set and posted on the calendar.

In order to insure deliberation and to prevent the enactment of legislation by surprise, all bills must be read three times in each house. However, the increase in legislative business, and the resulting pressure for time, has brought about the custom of reading the bill by title only, except that the third reading of appropriation bills is at length unless there is a suspension of the rule by unanimous consent of either house. It is interesting to note that the "three readings" requirement was copied from the English parliamentary procedure and was largely insisted upon in the early days as a basis for giving information to members at a period when printing was either non-existent or difficult and the ability to read not general. Bills which come up for legislative consideration must be printed with all the amendments, if there are any. This is required in order to give the members the opportunity to become acquainted with the full and final text of the bill.

After being received from the committee, bills go through two stages in each house, that of engrossment and final passage, the latter stage corresponding to the third reading. Any bill may be killed at the outset by a vote to indefinitely postpone, or amended and returned to the committee for a hearing on the amendment, or amended and passed to third reading, or passed to third reading in its original form. If indefinitely postponed at any stage it may be given another chance, if someone who voted with the majority asks for reconsideration at the following session.

Amendments play an important part in legislative procedure because they serve to perfect many measures. An amendment is often the result of a thorough discussion at committee hearings. Frequently it is the result of compromise and concession and often it reconciles views which are only slightly divergent. It also increases the chances of public approval without which a law is but a dead letter. In the assembly, amendments may be introduced at any time before the bill is engrossed, but after the bill is engrossed a unanimous consent of the house is necessary to consider an amendment, and if the amendment is adopted the bill must be again engrossed.

In the senate, amendments are in order only upon the second reading of the bill.

After the bill is passed to third reading, it appears for final vote on the calendar of the next calendar day, that is, two days later. At this time it cannot be amended. If voted down, it can be temporarily saved at least by a request for reconsideration. If passed, it waits twenty-four hours for a possible request for reconsideration, unless reconsideration is immediately asked for and voted down. Assuming that a bill has been introduced in the assembly and has passed that house, the bill is then messaged to the senate, where it goes through practically the same stages as it did in the assembly.

If an assembly bill is passed by the senate, but is amended by that body it must go back to the assembly. The assembly may either concur in the senate amendment or nonconcur and request a conference. If a conference is asked, the two houses appoint committees which meet and confer. Disagreements are ordinarily adjusted by these conference committees, and the results are reported back to each of the two houses. If the two houses adopt the conference committee report, the bill becomes a law. If a bill is passed by the senate, which passage is referred to as "concurred in", in exactly the form in which it came from the assembly, it is then rolled for presentation to the governor, and is thereupon presented to him for approval. If it is returned by the governor to the assembly signed, it becomes a law; or if the governor retains it ten days, without signing, it also becomes a law.

The governor employs an attorney to examine all bills before he signs them, so that if errors are found they can be corrected before his signature is affixed; or if they are thought to be unconstitutional or are not in conformity with the governor's sentiments he may attempt to prevent their becoming a law by using his veto power. Should he veto a bill, the bill is referred back to the house in which it originated, with a message giving the reasons why the governor has not signed the bill. To become a law, notwithstanding the governor's veto, it is necessary that the bill be passed again by both houses by an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the members present, voting by roll call.

In the assembly the yea and nay vote is taken by a machine, the assembly being equipped with an electrical voting device. By using this mechanism, very little time is required for the taking of votes designed to pass a bill over the governor's veto, as well as for the many other roll calls which come into each day's sessions. There is a constitutional provision which requires that on the passage in either house of the legislature of any law which imposes a tax, or creates a debt, or continues an appropriation the question shall be taken by yeas and nays. There are several other legislative rules on voting, one of which sets forth that the yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question shall at the request of one-sixth of those present be entered on the journal.

An essential prerequisite of lawmaking in a democracy is publicity in regard to legislative activities. For this reason a complete system of record keeping of legislative transactions has been devised. Each house is required to keep a journal of its proceedings and to publish such journal daily. This journal is an effective agency for publicity and it is a valuable report for the use of the legislature and the courts, as well as for individuals. Both houses of the legislature also issue a daily calendar showing the order of business for the day. These calendars are supposed to be furnished to members at least twenty-four hours before the business which they announce is acted upon. Bulletins of the proceedings of the legislature are issued weekly showing the present status and detailed legislative history of each bill. Likewise, each house issues a bulletin of committee hearings. By the use of this system of record-keeping anyone interested in a particular measure is able to follow its technical passage through the legislature, to receive advance information in regard to the hearings upon it, and to be informed about its final disposition.

Shortly after a bill is signed by the governor it becomes an act. It is filed in the secretary of state's office where a chapter number is assigned. The secretary of state publishes it officially, first in the newspapers, and then in the session laws. The time when each legislative act shall come into effect is stated in the act itself. At the end of the session all of the laws which have been enacted are incorporated into the statutes of the state by the Revisor of Statutes.

Before concluding this article it should be mentioned that, besides bills, resolutions are used by the legislature for the purpose of expressing its opinion on certain matters, such as legislation pending in Congress. Resolutions serve to make known the attitude of the legislature on matters of public policy in regard to contemplated action, or to express its good will, regret or endorsement of various subjects. Resolutions go through the same routine as bills with the difference, however, that after final passage by the legislature they do not require the approval of the governor.

This, in a general way, is an explanation of the main steps in the process of enactment of a bill from its introduction to its final passage. There are, however, by actual count in the Wisconsin legislative manual some four hundred provisions which are laid down as methods of legislative procedure. While many of them have become obsolete, and have outgrown their original purpose, their object, in the final analysis is to safeguard as much as possible the right of expression on the part of the various economic and social groups whose interests may be affected by proposed legislation. It is probably because of its whole-hearted adherence to the spirit of these rules and regulations that the legislature of Wisconsin, as is universally admitted, comes closer to fulfilling the aspirations of its constituents than any other similar body in the country.

The Assembly Parlor.

MEMBERS OF SENATE

FIRST SENATORIAL DISTRICT

Manitowoc, Kewaunee and Door Counties.

JOHN E. CASHMAN (Rep.) is a native of Franklin, Kewaunee Co., Wis., where he farms the land his father purchased from the government in 1858, and carved out of the wilderness. He was educated in the common schools, a term at Valparaiso University, and later studied law two years at the Chicago Law School. For a number of years he taught school in Kewaunee and Brown counties. In 1896 he married Miss Sophie Duaine of De Pere, who died in 1907, leaving one son. In 1922 Mr. Cashman was elected to the state senate by a majority of over 9,000 votes, and in 1926, he was re-elected without opposition, receiving 12,636 votes. In 1924, he was one of the La Follette delegates to the National Republican Convention at Cleveland.

In the session of 1923 Mr. Cashman became prominent through the passage of his measure eliminating from Wisconsin schools certain histories which he believed treasonable. He maintained that these denatured texts were written from the British viewpoint and placed in the schools after the late war; that they omitted important names and events in American history which for more than a century had inspired American school children; that they slandered the patriots, belittled their cause, dug up the faults of the Nation's founders and presented to Young America a travesty on history so colored as to make the future citizens ashamed of the Revolution, the War of 1812, and of the heroic men who made their country free; that such texts were calculated to lessen respect for American tradition and achievement and to promote new-found schemes of alliance with Europe. As a result of his contention two historians revamped their histories and brought out new editions under American colors within thirty days and the others were afterward either re-revised or withdrawn from publication.

In 1924 Mr. Cashman was appointed by Governor Blaine to the Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin. He is responsible for co-operative marketing being now placed on the program of farm institutes in the state. He supported the decision of the Regents which banned scholarships at the University with money provided by incorporated monopoly endowments. In the session of 1925 Mr. Cashman, as chairman of the committee on highways, had charge of the highway measure which provided equitable distribution of state funds for highway purposes.

WAUPACA COUNTY

While attending district school and the neighboring high school he boarded at home thus maintaining the intimate contact and interest in the old homestead. At the age of nineteen he combined farming in summer with teaching district school in winter. Graded and high school work appealed to him and in preparation for the latter he attended summer sessions of the University of Wisconsin and secured his license to teach in high school by passing the tests submitted by the State Board of Examiners for state certificates. After thirteen years of teaching he was elected county superintendent of schools in Waupaca county. During that time he designed a system of ventilation of rural schools by means of the jacket which was very generally adopted throughout the state and opened the way for the law which granted a bonus of $50.00 a year to rural schools that should conform to certain requirements including an approved system of ventilation. He recommended and secured the establishment at New London of the third county normal in Wisconsin. This act was made an issue in the campaign, and in the county convention he was defeated for renomination. Following this defeat he went back to the old homestead and for six years was successful in the vocation he had learned in boyhood.

In 1908 he purchased the Waupaca Republican which had been issued since 1853, and a few months later he purchased the Waupaca Post and in this merger he was joined by the men in the mechanical department, thus securing the financial cooperation of men who formerly had worked only for wages. After more than twenty years this organization stands and functions in the absence of the senior member who now is a minority stockholder in the corporation.
